The Power of Partnership

Through our work in the community over 13 years, Strengthening Neighborhoods has witnessed and taken part in numerous powerful partnerships – among neighbors, among residents and nonprofit organizations, and among communities and institutions. When all of the partners involved recognize and honor the gifts, insight, abilities, shared goals, and desired outcomes of the others, an authentic connection blossoms and real community change happens.

In this report, you’ll read stories about how institutions in Metro Denver have discovered and adopted practices that support their commitment to develop true partnerships with the communities they serve.

These institutions have learned to value:

- The importance of RELATIONSHIPS with community residents, seeing them as partners instead of clients or the recipients of services
- Intentional LISTENING to community input
- SHARED LEARNING
- Creating the space for PARTICIPATION of community members within the institution
- SHARED LEADERSHIP
- Effective POWERFUL partnerships resulting in positive community CHANGE

We hope these stories illustrating the power of partnerships will inspire dialogue, collaborative action, and stronger communities.
Strengthening Neighborhoods is working to forge new linkages among nonprofits, municipal groups, and the communities they serve. Professionals from nine different agencies have joined in the “Aurora Learning Circle” to discover how they can work with residents to better accomplish their missions and strengthen their communities.

Patrick Horvath, Director of Strengthening Neighborhoods, explains why this is important: “For communities to grow stronger, service agencies and residents need to work together. Instead of delivering ‘aid’ to ‘poor clients,’ nonprofits and municipal services providers need to think about partnering with residents who can work with them to transform community life. Community change takes effective programs and people working together, and always with residents at the center.”

One member of the Aurora Learning Circle is Ruben Medina, Supervisor of Moorhead Recreation Center in Original Aurora. “I grew up in a small town in Southern Colorado where the community center was the center for everything – from preschool to youth sports to social services,” Ruben recalls. “When I came to Moorhead, I wanted to see more visibility for our center, so my goal was to go out into the community.” Ruben spent time walking around, finding people - especially young people - where they congregated and asking them what they needed and wanted from a community center.

About the same time, he connected with the Strengthening Neighborhoods Aurora Learning Circle and met Mike Green, a consultant from the Asset-Based Community Development Institute. “Mike Green and Strengthening Neighborhoods suggested I do something called a world café for neighbors,” Ruben says. “This was so that everyone’s voice could be heard – not just the most talkative.” The assembled residents identified their top ten areas of concern. At the very top of the list? Safety.
“So we brought in the police department to talk to people about how to take care of themselves,” says Ruben. “And we’ve worked with OACIC (Original Aurora Community Integration Collaborative) to teach self-defense classes to Bhutanese refugees.” Many other activities emerged from the world café exercise, including nutritional cooking classes in partnership with Operation Frontline.

Strengthening Neighborhoods staff have been excited to watch Ruben’s success connecting with residents, and they are pleased that the City of Aurora is using a resident-centered outreach method to bring neighborhood residents into discussions about a bond issue to fund new and expanded rec centers.

“Our goal with the Aurora Learning Circle has been to encourage people to reach out beyond the walls of their organization or city department and see residents not just as clients but as partners,” says Patrick. “Now the members of the Learning Circle are working together on a huge mural to be painted on one side of Moorhead’s building.” OACIC, Downtown Aurora Visual Arts, and Ruben and his staff are gathering dozens of volunteers to plan and execute the mural in the coming months. There will be a community kick-off this fall.

The process began with a town hall meeting attended by about 100 people in August of 2009. Two subsequent community design meetings brought together another hundred residents and community leaders. Together they established the Holly Area Redevelopment Project (HARP) and created a Steering Committee of about twenty-five committed residents. The HARP Steering Committee then planned a fair to bring even more neighbors into the mix. In late April 2010 over 500 people came out to review design concepts, offer input, and celebrate the possibilities for rebirth.

The concepts included such things as a central plaza, a playground, and a community garden surrounded by multi-use buildings. The first phase of the project – a peace mural and basketball courts built atop the ashes of Holly Square Shopping Center – is expected to be finished by fall of 2010.

While the community’s vision for the site is developing, challenges still exist. “Finding funding in the current economy is very difficult,” says Aaron Miripol, President of ULC. “We also know that many of the residents would like a grocery store, because this area is considered a ‘food desert.’” Because the site is not on a main thoroughfare, it likely won’t attract a big chain grocery store. A smaller store or farmers market is still a possibility.

The process is underway to rebuild on the torched Holly Square site and to restore the community’s sense of hope. The good news is that the Urban Land Conservancy understands that it must take the lead from the people who have invested their lives in their community. Strengthening Neighborhoods will be there to encourage them and to help residents find their voice every step of the way.
It started as a community center begun by the people. Lorraine Granado and Eric Wright helped found the Cross Community Coalition (CCC) in 1987. Focusing on the often-ignored communities of Elyria Swansea and Globeville, they moved into a storefront in Swansea in 1992. They wanted to help community residents – their neighbors -- work together for positive change by providing opportunities for individual advancement and by working to improve the quality of life for all residents in their communities. Sometimes they had to take on toxic polluters; other times they pieced together funding and created programs for youth, parenting, or English as a Second Language classes. But they were always committed to being a place for neighborhood action. When Lorraine challenged the local funding community to help build a community space for Elyria Swansea and Globeville that would become CCC’s permanent home, a number of donors stepped up and helped finance a Family Resource Center. The spacious new building was completed in October 2005.

As Lorraine retired in 2009, however, Eric noticed that CCC’s two-decade struggle to provide more services to their struggling communities had overwhelmed the organization’s capacity to listen to the residents of those communities. Expanded service delivery did not always flow from or lead to participation by community residents in CCC’s work and vision. And each new project came with its own grant requirements, mandatory evaluation activities, and reams of paperwork. The CCC board and staff felt the strain. Early in 2010 Eric finally took time to step back and think with his board about how to re-focus CCC on the grassroots community that had given them life. He engaged Strengthening Neighborhoods consultant Mike Green to help the CCC board create a plan for listening to the community and adjusting the organization to be a true neighborhood partner. After one retreat, a board member exclaimed, “It’s time to do with the community instead of for the community.”

The CCC board and staff have begun to do just that. They have scheduled a series of one-to-one listening conversations, the first of which gathered individuals who are enrolled in CCC service programs like English as a Second Language and Parenting. They’ve begun to set up meetings with neighborhood leaders, everyday folks involved in block-clubs, soccer leagues, PTO’s, and neighborhood gardens. “Like everyone else,” says Eric, “we are moving ahead with this re-focusing effort regardless of the economic strain our organization is under. This is important work. It’s like going back to our roots!”

Strengthening Neighborhoods (SN) is The Denver Foundation’s grassroots neighborhood development program. SN helps residents of ten partner neighborhoods use their existing strengths and assets to make their communities better places to live.

History: In 1996, The Denver Foundation asked 100 leading members of the community to share ideas about how the Foundation could expand its impact. Their number one suggestion was “Neighborhood and Community Capacity Building.” In response, The Denver Foundation created Strengthening Neighborhoods.

How it works: SN makes grants directly to residents for projects that the residents develop and lead.

Grants: SN has two grantmaking programs:
• Planning Grants up to $500 (average grant size is $250)
• Project Grants up to $5,000 (average grant size is $2,300)

Guidelines:
• Grants are limited to residents and projects in the ten partner neighborhoods.
• Although the maximum grant size is $5,000, proposals with much smaller budgets are strongly encouraged.
• All proposed projects must be created and led by residents.
• Projects must build on assets or strengths already existing in the neighborhood, such as residents’ specific skills, a local park, or the resources available in an existing neighborhood group.
• Groups do not need to be tax-exempt nonprofit organizations to qualify for funding.

How to Apply: Please read the Strengthening Neighborhoods Guidelines before applying for a grant. The guidelines, as well as the online grant application, can be found at www.strengtheningneighborhoods.org. You can also receive the guidelines by calling The Denver Foundation at 303.300.1790.
